How To Overcome Alcohol Addiction For Life Signs and symptoms of alcohol addiction Different Signs and symptoms of alcohol addiction are often used to characterize the three general stages of alcoholism. Every stage develops over years, becoming more severe as time advances. A person can be identified as being in either early, middle or late stage alcoholic based on signs and symptoms he/she shows. Early Stage symptoms One of the most common alcoholic symptoms happens when a person starts to depend on alcohol to improve their mood. A person drinks alcohol to gain relief from life problems or stress. Gradually, without knowing they think more about drinking, this is one of the early concealed signs of alcoholism addiction. This is the most elusive stage and one that is not easily detected. The next series of signs includes a gradual increase in the drinkers tolerance, their body starts to adapt to the ever-rising rising amounts of alcohol. They find they need to drink more quantities to attain the same buzzed feeling. The primary sign of alcoholism at this stage is a person can consume the larger amount of alcohol and appear to function as if have not had a drink at all. Unexpectedly, an individuals capability to function can improve as they drink more making it difficult to detect if one needs help with their alcoholism. Their blood alcohol levels increase and they continue to think quickly, talk or walk normally obscuring obvious symptoms and signs of alcoholism. As an alcoholic keeps drinking, their body loses its capability to cope with high alcohol levels. If a person stops drinking, the blood alcohol level goes down and their ability to talk, think or walk deteriorations. They are transitioning into the next alcoholism.
